

As for Hanging in Kansas.

The Kansas legislature is getting ready to scrap over an effort to restore capital punishment in the state. A convention of ministers has, by resolution, memorialized the law making power in favor of the re-emetment of the death penalty. Before the repeat of that law we do not remomber of but one legal execution ever having taken place in Kanses. A Lyon county boy who had been accested for stealing a horse in Orage county, in trying to escape from an old man who was guarding him-there being no jail in the county at the time-so wounded the old man that he subsequently died, for which the prisoner was found guilty of murder in the first degree and hung. But he was not guilty of murder in the first degree, and his condemnation and execution was an outrage which had more or less to do with the enactment of the present law. The boy, Bujes, dld not dream of-killing Polley, the old man who was guarding him. It was during war times and human life seemed to count for little, especially along western borders.

The resolutions and convictions of ministerial associations to the contrary, notwithstanding, many of the enlightened and more humane people of Kansas are against the death penalty. Whether justice should be tempered with mercy or not, hanging or otherwise legally and coolly taking human life is a relic of barbarism, under which, without doubt, innocence often suffers. Murder in the first degree, murder with deliberate and premeditated malice aforethought, is very seldem committed. Murders and manufaughters for the most part are immediate results of swift passion, in the absence of any reflection or thought or apprehension of any legally prescribed penalty.
